

Bluetooth Upgrade for RØDE's Wireless Micro

RØDE has today announced a major firmware update for its award-winning Wireless Micro, introducing Direct Connect – a new feature that allows users to connect Wireless Micro transmitters directly to iOS devices without the need for a physical receiver. Available through the RØDE Capture app, Direct Connect enables Wireless Micro transmitters to pair directly with iPhones via Bluetooth, eliminating the need for any additional hardware or accessories. This dramatically streamlines setup while preserving the pristine audio quality the Wireless Micro is known for.

"With Direct Connect, we're making content creation more seamless than ever," said Damien Wilson, CEO of RØDE. "It's a direct response to what our users have been asking for – true wireless freedom, less hardware, and complete control from their phone. We're thrilled to bring this feature to the Wireless Micro as we continue leading the way in compact, professional audio solutions."

In addition to Direct Connect, the update introduces several powerful enhancements within the RØDE Capture companion app. A brand-new noise reduction feature helps deliver even cleaner audio by minimising background noise – perfect for recording in dynamic or uncontrolled environments. This setting can be toggled independently for each transmitter, giving users precise control over their sound.

For added versatility, creators now have the option to record in merged or split modes. In merged mode, audio from both transmitters is combined into a single, ready-to-publish stereo track; in split mode, each transmitter is recorded to a separate channel, offering greater flexibility during post-production. Finally, a new output gain control lets users easily adjust recording levels directly within the app, ensuring perfectly balanced audio every time.
